Corruption is a threat to civil society. It is the use of official position, rank or status by an office bearer for a personal benefit. Following from this definition, examples of corrupt behaviors would include bribery, fraud, embezzlement, nepotism, and appropriation of public assets and property for private use.

Corruption is widely spread mainly in developing countries, due to their poverty, low salaries, the weak legislative and judicial system, and the poorly developed principles of ethics as well as the political instability. The effects of corruption on these countries can be summarized in three main points. First, there will be lower investments including direct foreign investments. Second, the economic growth will be reduced. Third, the country will be exposed to currency crisis.

No country is entirely free of corruption. Corruption takes such proportion that it can hinder economic growth and undermine efforts to establish good governance. Thus, those attempting to reduce corruption should focus on creating an anti-corruption culture.
